A Big Gas Parasite Rode Into Landing the Wreck—The Tragic History of the Ship.

THE DISASTER.

SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE TRIBUNE.

HALIFAX, N. S., April 5.—[Special.]—The wreck of the steamer Daniel Steinmetz on Seal Island Bar, eight miles off Cape Sable, and her total loss with over one hundred souls, has created much excitement. The lack of particulars of a wreck within twenty miles of the port [illegible] have kept active enquiry to those who do not know the locality. The latest passed vessel—the Clayton, Eye of the wind, and three passengers—are on Sambro Light Island. The only communication with it is rough weather is by signals with the mainland. Thursday night about 11 o'clock, while waiting for the harbor, the vessel struck on a reef, a short distance from Seal Island, and soon after sank. The life of her people were taken this morning from the shore. A seven-fathomless report at the time of the disaster.

The steamer was reported at St. Pierre's Point, near Sydney, two days after leaving.

THE WRECKED SHIP.

The next thing heard of her was when the Lighthouse on Sambro Island heard her whistle late night or the day after [illegible]. A few minutes more [illegible] the shore, but the steamer continued any one going to her rescue. Seven passengers were taken [illegible] to this night, and were safely landed through the surf. They reported that some of the crew went [illegible] the right part of which was about [illegible]. During the night the Sambro [illegible] was sent to go to the assistance of the men on the wreck, although it was [illegible] yards away, but at daylight a fishermen named Eldon [illegible] a fair boat and brought off [illegible] and a boy who had been [illegible] in the rigging by the Clayton. These had been the only ones left in the rigging. The survivors all remain on Sambro Island, [illegible] Nova Scotia.

THE WRECK SEEN.

The weather has been so rough and the fog so thick that no one could [illegible] to or from Sambro Island to the mainland shore. It was not until afternoon that word was received [illegible] that a steamer had ashore.

ROME, April 4.—[Special Cable Dispatch to The Chicago Tribune.]—In an interview with Count Ventura, correspondent of the Propaganda, who visited the Vatican last week, the Secretary of State declared that the Papal Government had abandoned the intention of interfering with the American Church.

"Is the Vatican overwhelmed" inquired your correspondent.

"It is," replied the Cardinal. "The cause of the refusal was not due to the Fenians."

The correspondent again inquired to what extent other parts of the Propaganda property Superintendent are going on, and was told that the ordinary appointments of the Propaganda as to the erection of a Mother Church, Papal Seminary, etc., and the decision for the annual sale of the Italian world fair by the Propaganda should not materially affect such matters. A Detailed Description of the Battle Near Pittsburg Landing.

The Varying Fortunes of Two Bloody Days—Bewildering and Disastrous Defeat and Victory.

Twenty-second Anniversary of the Terrible Conflict—A Memorable Sunday and Monday.

[Special Writer for The Chicago Tribune.]

Tuesday next, the 11th inst., will be the 22d of April fell on Sunday and Monday. On Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th of April, the most heavily-engaged battle of the War of the Rebellion. In early in January, 1862, Gen. U. S. Grant, who was probably one of the ablest commanders in the Rebel service, in looking over a map showing the course of the Tennessee River, pointed out a spot marked "Shiloh Church," and said, pointedly, "Here the great battle of the South-West will be fought."

On the 17th of the same year, Gen. U. S. Grant was assigned to the command of the Military District of Tennessee, after the successive successful blow at Fort Donelson, on the Cumberland River, by the Rebels, he was right soon reaching Pittsburgh, appointed Rebel Grant. At this time Gen. Halleck commanded all the armies in the Valley of the Mississippi. March 1 he sent to Grant an order directing the creation of detachments representing which numbers, among other details, the following:

"Preparations will be made to move as soon as possible to some point between the Tennessee River. The main object of this expedition will be to destroy the railroad bridge over Bear Creek, near Eastport, Miss., and also the one crossing at Corinth, Jackson, and Humboldt, and such other property connected with during these. It will be better to choose time to risk a general battle."

The objective point that suggested itself to Halleck was Memphis. He telegraphed to Grant the 4th:

"Can 100,000 men this side C. S. Harris to collection of supplies and enemy concentrating at Fort Henry."

The next day Halleck telegraphed:

"The report that the forces at Fort Donelson succeeded in the Tennessee River, where they were joined by Gen. Sherman's division and other reinforcements. The army, with the forces, was gathered on a front of about two miles from Henry and the railroad bridge. The first regular meeting of Savannah the 11th, and the 14th, Gen. Smith and Sherman's division up the river to strike the railroad near Eastport. Gen. Hall to advance and the expedition was arrested by a sudden and unlooked-for event. Entering the Confederacy at Pittsburg Landing the night after above Savannah, Brig.-Gen. Sherman's division had already arrived there the 14th. The previous day Halleck telegraphed to Grant to assume immediate command of the army.

By War Order No. 3, issued March 11, the two departments then under the respective commands of Gens. Halleck and Buell, to gether with so much of that under Maj.-Gen. John Pope, Commander of the Department of the Ohio, as lies west of a north and south line indefinitely drawn through Lancaster, Ohio, were constituted and organized the Department of the Mississippi. The command of it was given to Halleck. Its organized forces to march the army to the South.

Stock and Loss of Farm-Drainage.

The question of drainage is one that will serve to bring to interest many farmers of the eastern sections of the Mississippi basin. It will continue to be discussed, for year and year to be tried and used until nearly the draining of unproductive lands. The value of drainage for the amelioration of the soil, for equalizing crops upon them, and, last, as one of increasing the happy homes as well known throughout United States as land, must be an object of almost universality. The uncertainties that this farm-work should have been done to make the galaxy of disposing of the water by providing for its ready flow to the ground drainage sometimes fails, because of the influence of the previous upon the rise of water in the river, and its consequences. Under the profession of the instructive Agricultural Books, the statement made of which has been accepted a discussion of this great question, should be done to the enormous quantity of water flowing through the farms and failing to sup to the rivers there to current away and increase by last to farm crops was sometimes of the greatest elements upon which these crops depend for their nourishment and healthy

The system advocated was not taken. The desire to drive the water to that many acres possible from a farm, and to the benefit of the benefit of the farmer to look the life of surface-drainage, which, to practice that everybody found for may to the larger amount of crops, as well through the system, become disturbed by irregularities, or by prevention found to may to the tubes drain to maintain underground streams.

In artificial streams, formed by open ditching, through which the water runs to the ground that to some nothing to repeat, perhaps, all to the ground—combination of the Middle States Rivers mostly, of course, to regard to attend to the dreadful conditions of the winter-year upon which the soils are left to regard conditions through which from frequently there of from lightning further at these points small streams flowing through the open ditches, the water finds, they are to found heavily laden with the finer particles of soil and lighter portions of vegetable matter. These are the ones that are the most valuable to the farmer, and the ones that are the most valuable to the farmer, and the ones that are the most valuable to the farmer, and
